A Farm Romance

Farm Romances ...(Life in the Hay)

This is usually a very private matter, and discussing it with the public is like sharing private and intimate moments. However, there comes a time when certain romances have to be given their place in print.

A few years ago we had a flock of ducks. They were simply common white farm ducks. During one of our long cold winters the local fox and coyote population took an uncommon interest in the art of dining on duck meat. We managed to save two, who, in their traumatized state, welcomed the confined quarters allotted to them in the barn. They cheerfully mingled with the ewes and their new born lambs, quacking away and offering solicitous advice to ewes grunting in their final throes of lambing.

Now, during the Spring, we introduced a flock of geese to the farm. In no time these creatures had taken over the ministry of self-importance previously held by a belligerent Holstein cow aptly named Bossie. They did this with a lot of noise, posturing and threatening hisses. Spring became Summer. The geese had goslings. The ducks did not despite their frantic attempts at trying to mate. Since both of them were playing the daddy's role we presumed they were of similar gender. Furthermore no one was building a nest, just all this goofing around.

The self important geese were not too friendly to the ducks. They could share the pond as long as they kept a respectable distance. The relationship intensified between the ducks. After all they only had each other until disaster struck in the late months of Summer. One of the ducks must have become over confident and wandered out one night to the utter joy of a passing predator looking for an easy meal.

The loneliness and devastation of the last duck was poignantly felt by every one on the farm. It used to do a two step shuffle wherever it went. Sort of backwards, forwards and two to the left or right. You did not have to be a psychologist to see that it was lonely, afraid and suffering from an identity crisis. Very few creatures on this planet enjoy isolation, especially those who live in groups of two or more. This duck was no exception.

After having lost its mate, the duck had taken to swimming closer and closer to the geese. The geese displayed open hostility and insisted that the duck keep its respectful distance and not encroach on their group. To do so was to elicit a charge from the gander who would grab the duck by its neck and give it several whacks from its wings. The gander did just enough posturing and wing beating to keep the duck out of the goose flock and did not do any bodily harm as long as it kept a respectful distance.

When the geese left the pond and sauntered around the farm in their self important rolling gait, the poor duck would follow in its funny little shuffle, always at the correct and permissible distance.

As Christmas approached the duck, probably due to bad dreams of foxes, shortened the distance between the last goose and himself. Strangely enough the gander tolerated this as long as he kept one duck's distance between himself and the last goose in the cue. I am sure that this was not entirely motivated by generous feelings on the part of the geese, but rather as a gesture of self-preservation. Geese also feature high on the dietary menu of coyotes and foxes. They must have reasoned that if a sneak attack was to be made from the rear, the slow duck would cop it giving the geese a chance to get away.

Well, Winter progressed and the duck was accepted as rear guard and at the bottom of the pecking order. I am sure that this compromise was agreeable to the flock as it gave some relief to the goose who had previously held the position as being last on the pecking order.

At last Spring returned and all the geese paired off with their mates. However, there was one little goose, (I suspect she was the one at the end of the cue) who did not have a gander. While the rest of the flock were making whoopee, building nests and doing the maternal and paternal thing, the duck and goose wondered around in a sort of bewildered platonic relationship.

Now a strange thing happened to the little duck. Instead of doing his funny hang dog shuffle, he started to walk on his toes and stretched his neck out. He was definitely role playing the goose. He hissed, (not too convincingly) and started casting amorous glances at the goose. She began to respond to his advances and selected a nesting site. Talk about a moral boost! The duck nearly doubled in size. When any of the other ganders came near the nest he would start to do the two step shuffle and you could see the indecision as he remembered his status in the flock. However, the now proudly sitting little goose would slowly rise from her nest, sidle up to her duck, and show him how to hiss, flap and defend their nest.

Amazingly he metamorphosed into a DOOSE. He even sat on the nest when the little goose had to take a bathroom or lunch break. He roll-played so well that he became very convincing as a gander/drake.

About three weeks later we were all surprised to see that some serious activity was taking place at their nest. It took the shape of bright yellow little balls of fluff. Certainly not some wonderful cross-breed. The boss gander must have had his way with the little goose some time before the duck had learned to defend his rights. However, our Pa was not the least bit aware that they were not his. Life on the farm went on. The duck took his position at the back of the goose train-but not quite. Behind him were four goslings followed by the little goose. And you know, that duck always walked funny. Not quite like a duck or a goose, but sort of tippy toes.

This is a true story and I bet The National Inquirer would love to get their hands on it and deliver the sordid details of an uncommon relationship. So we felt it would be only fair if we copy righted this little narrative to Pasu Farm to protect the rights of this quaint and loving, if not slightly uncommon, little family drama.

Geese are can be intimidating and are well known to be excellent guard creatures and also outstanding companions.

BOUTIQUE NEWS

By Genevieve

The price of health is immeasurable. If you have it, it can make you feel like a million bucks; and if you don't, it is debilitating. So if your resolve is to get outside, smell the fresh air and get a dose of vitamin D while getting daily exercise, we might have just the answer for you.

New Year Resolutions require discipline, motivation and courage to be effective. Old Man Winter can be discouraging with his cold fangs sinking into your bones and dissolving your resolution.

We have a few tools to make it bearable and even enjoyable by keep warm without overheating and perspiring.

Here is your check list available now and soon to be on sale at PaSu.

WOOL UNDERWEAR– Long Johns and thermal under shirt made from unbleached super soft MERINO WOOL. It breathes and wicks the moisture away from your body so that you always feel warm and dry whilst being soft against your skin .

The added bonus is that wool is antimicrobial which effectively means that it acts as a sort of deodorant.

HEAD GEAR– A SHEEPSKIN HAT for severe windy weather, or a soft lined WOOL TOQUE to protect your head (especially your ears) from cold winter winds and blustery Chinooks.

HAND GEAR– SHEEPSKIN MITTS or GLOVES to protect hands.

FOOT GEAR– For very cold feet a wool lined MUKLUK with THERMAL MOHAIR SOCKS are the very best.

EXPOSED SKIN– The cold can be cruel to exposed skin, especially your lips. PaSu LIP BALM and SKINCREAM with LANOLIN is probably the best protection available.

FASHION STATEMENT– bring it all together with a dashing SCARF that makes you look and feel good as well as protecting you if it really starts to blow.
